LETTER OF GEORGE ELIOT.

ronds
I must tell you that it is not inle, very strictly observed, not to read the criticisms on my writings. For years I have found this abstinence necessary to proserve me from that disconragement as an artist which ill-judged praise, no less than ill judged blame, tends to produce in me. For far worse than any verdict as to the proportion of good and evil in our work is the painful impression that we write for a public which has no discernment of good and evil.

work is the painful impression that we write for a public which has no disceniment of good and evil.

My bushand reads any notices of me that com a before him and reports to me (or clied reframs from reporting) the general character of the notice, or something in particular which strikes him as showing either an exceptional ineight or an obtuseness that is gross enough to be amusing. Yery rarely, when he has read a critique of mi, he has handed it to me, saying. You must read this. And your estimate of "Dame! Deronda made one of these are instances.

Certainly, if I had been asked to choose what should be written about my book and who should write it, I should have sketched—well, not anything so good as what you have written, but an article which must be written by a lew who showed not merely supathy with the best aspirations of his race but a remarkable might into the nature of art and the processes of the artistic mind. Lelieve me I should not be artists intention, which must make the fullest, rarest joy to one who whowed the diarramating sensibility, the perfect response to be artists intention, which must make the fullest, rarest joy to one who works from in ward conviction, and not in compliance with urrent fashions. Such a response helds for an author not only what is best in 'the life hat non is," but the promise of that "which is to come." I mean that the usual approximative marrow perception of what one has been intending and professedly forling in one is work, impresses one with the sense that it must be proxing and professedly forling in one is work, impresses one with the sense that the usual proximating as one to hope that the creative prompting has foreshadowed, and will continue to saidly a need in other minds.

A Battle Between Birds.

A gentleman from Stone County gives the particulars of a remarkable incident which he witnessed while crossing White River on the ferry just above the month of Sycamore Creek When nearly hali ray across the stream an enormous eagle swooped down on a flock of geese, which were swimming in the river some eighty rods below the boat. The fowls, upon observing the engle approaching, instinctively dived under the water just as the bud struck the wave Baffied in the first assault the eagle flew slowly upwaid, and when the geese came to the surface, darted downward again, and burying its talons in one of them, attempted to bear it swar. The goose struggled rolently, while its companions awam around uttering shrill cries and the persons on the ferry boat watched the strange score with keen interest. Once the eagle hit-d its prey clear out of the water and seemed on the point of convey ing it to the mountain chiff that rose grandly in the an on the other side of the stream, but the struggles of the goos-forced the captor downward. When water was again reached the goose made a supreme offort and plunged below the suitace, dragging the cagle after it and causing the latter to loosen its hold and rise upward with a fierre stream

The eaglenext attacked mother goose, but with the same result, being com polled to reiniquish its hold when its in tended victim plunged beneath the waves. This strange contest lasted fully thirty numities at the end of which time the eigle give up the light, and, rising soared away to the mountains westward while the flock of greek swam further down the stream. A number of the neighbors and friends of our respected fellowout as the latest victim, and last evening the party visited his comfortable home on West Eldorado street, and took possession of the dwelling, every room of which was completely filled with the unexpected invaders. Mr. Dill was at home, and he was completely overcome by the sudden appearance of such a large company of people; but he made the best of the situation and he bade all enter and make themselves at home, which they proceeded to do in the most approved manner. After wraps had been removed and the well filled baskets had been consigned to the proper room, all engaged in social conversation, while a number of the ladies prepared the supper which was subsequently served in fine style. Mr. Dill received a number of presents, several admiring ladies presented him with a case filled with cigars, and the gentlemen gave the host tobacco in abundance. part of which was raised in Moultrie county. James Shipp in Jail for Stealing Chickens from W. Z. Brown.

THE CHARGE SUSTAINED

Nearly the whole of yesterday was devoted to hearing the testimony in Justice Lowry's court for and against James Shipp, the father of five children, who was on trial for stealing about a dozen chickens from W. Z. Brown's hen house at "Brownsville," near the West Main street crossing of the Wabash road. The theft was committed about two, weeks ago; but in order to get at the chickens the thief had to break a lock, and more correctly speaking, it was on the charge of burglary that Shipp had an examination State's Attorney Johns appeared for the People and Henry Mitchell for the defendant. The evidence offered by the People was mainly circumstantial, but it was of the strongest character. The testimony of the defendant's witnesses was conflicting, and at the conclusion of the hearing Justice Lowry held the prisoner to await the action of the May grand jury, fixing the bail at $500, in default of which amount Shipp was recommitted to the county jail for safe keeping. BIGAMIST BIRD.

Alva Bird, the alleged bigamist from hearing. The prisoner waived an examination, and he went back to the county jail in default of bail in the sum of $300. The prisoner will endeavor to secure his case he is indicted, which is not at all imto be very strong.
